get orientes...

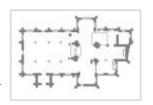

To begin with, the orientation of churches was not important - although for some unknown reason, the church usually stands to the north of the village. By the 5th century it became customary to build churches with the main or high altar at the east end. East and south were and are the honoured sides, with the north and west are less favoured.

There are a number of references in the Bible to God in the east. Facing east for worship, in the direction that the sun rises, is probably pre-Christian and is not a purely Christian practice. Muslims also face eastward to pray, towards Mecca.

Graves in a churchyard also usually face east. Christians adopted the old Jewish custom of burying the dead with their feet towards the rising sun, as a sign of hope. It was also believed that when Jesus returned to earth, the faithful would rise up bodily from their graves. Christians wanted to be facing the right way at the moment of his return.

The south door of a church was and is most commonly used, and was usually much more elaborately decorated than that on the north. Directly opposite the south door and font, in the north wall of most ancient churches stands the north door, or 'Devil's Door'. This door was traditionally left open during a baptism to let out any evil spirits in the child. Evil and ignorance of the Gospel were believed to come from the north, so the gargoyles facing that way were particularly fierce. Only people who died in shady circumstances were buried on the north side of church, which was originally unconsecrated ground.

The west may also have had a negative linguistic association, since the Latin occidere, meaning 'to kill', was associated with the Occident, to the west. Unfortunately, the alignment of many modern churches, is hampered by the existence of roads and other obstacles. Why not visit some of our medieval churches and explore their orientation, and perhaps visit a mosque to see how they have successfully changed the alignment of a building built to fit the road

We hope you will all look forward to attending!
